

United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights

The Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights (OHCHR) represents the world's commitment to universal ideals of human dignity. It has a unique mandate from the international community to promote and protect all human rights.

You will:

- Be a person of international public stature, with the highest moral standing and personal integrity, and a thorough expertise in the field of human rights;
- Be a robust, consistent and outspoken champion of human rights, independent of governmental pressure and political expediency, with a proven record in this regard;
- Be ready to exert moral and managerial leadership, and engage in dialogue with a complex community of international human rights actors, providing inspiration, vision and guidance to governments, officials and people.

To contribute to a process of public consultation on this vital appointment, please visit:
www.avaaz.org/human_rights_commissioner

Disclaimer: This is an advertisement written and paid for by Avaaz.org, the world's largest online advocacy network. Avaaz does not purport to represent the United Nations secretariat, or agencies. However it believes that there should be more public debate and scrutiny over this and other top appointments to international institutions. This job description was written in consultation with leading human rights experts.